A NEW LINE OF THOUGHT

(By D. J. Walsh.)

THE Spencer high school had been out now for more than a month. The summer vacation was passing and Margaret and Angelina Carter, who taught in the school, were longing for something to happen so long as it brought a change. The first week or so after school closed the two young women had been busy in doing a big house cleaning in their small, old house. When the cleaning was all done to their entire satisfaction they turned their attention to the clothes, and when their wardrobe was in apple-pie order they made up and caught up with their reading. And now when they had done everything they had planned there seemed nothing further for them to do but sit with folded hands and wait for vacation to end and the school year to begin. Though, dear knows, the Carter girls were tired to death of teaching. In fact, they were tired of home and a wee bit tired of each other, and for the past week they had discussed the idea of selling or renting their house and boarding for the coming year.

"I think," said Margaret seriously one day when a morning of idleness had irritated her frayed nerves more than usual, "that I shall go to see Mr. Blaine and see if she will let me board with her this winter."

"Well, of course you can do as you please," answered Angelina, "but for my part I wouldn't think of boarding with Mr. Blaine, not with that snip of a daughter of hers in the house."

The discussion was waxing hot when the postman brought a special delivery. Angelina tore open the letter and read it.

"It's from Cousin Fanny Pringle," she announced as soon as the man had gone. "She is coming to make us a visit. She is planning a continental tour and she is seeking a congenial companion for herself and a comfortable, safe place where she can leave her things while she is gone—Darling—do you suppose Darling can be trusted? I never heard her mention it before, did you?"

"Never," said Margaret. "But read it, Angelina, maybe she will explain."

"I shall read it to you," said Angelina, "I shall read it to you in the hotel where I am staying. Mrs. Pringle wrote that I shall expect to take my meals with you girls, as the hotel fare doesn't agree with Darling. I will arrive some time before noon on Tuesday and I wish you to have an extra slice of steak, well-dressed, and cooked without either salt or pepper, that you will select the steak very carefully, for Darling is most fussy about her food. She is having a twist with her stomach and that is one reason why I am getting her out of the city for a few days, hoping the change will do her good. In her present condition of health I am uneasy about leaving her for my trip abroad and I shall not go unless I can find an understanding person to leave her with."

There was not a great lot more to the letter and nothing that explained the mysterious Darling.

Tuesday! Why, there would be only tomorrow in which to put the house in order and do the extra baking for the guests! The Carter girls were in excitement and with so much to do about and so many things to do that they forgot for a time their finances and were as busy as bees.

Tuesday morning dawned clear and bright. Margaret and Angelina were up at five o'clock putting the last touches to their immaculate house and cleaning the final details of the dinner. Everything must be perfect, for Cousin Fanny was very wealthy and gay, and then of course there was the mysterious Darling. No one could guess what she would be like. Probably some one out of the ordinary.

Cousin Fanny was always getting acquainted with unusual people. And now of course there was the trip abroad, and it all depended upon the visit of the Carter girls. Cousin Fanny took a notion to. A trip abroad with all its expenses paid was a prize worth working and fighting for if necessary. And Margaret and Angelina each secretly meant to do her best to win her way into the good graces of Cousin Fanny.

As the hands of the old-fashioned clock in the hall moved slowly toward the noon hour, excitement ran high. The table was set for five with all the best linen and silver, the dinner was cooking and the extra slice of steak was pounded to a shred and ready to be put over the coals at a moment's notice.

The coffee had just begun to percolate when Margaret, who had gone to the doorman's time to the front of the house, announced in a low tone: "They're come!" She ran to open the door.

Angelina, who was in the kitchen, opened the door and saw the two women, one of whom she had never seen before, standing in the front hall just as Margaret opened the door in answer to an imperative knock at the doorbell. On the steps stood Cousin Fanny. She was a stout old lady, elaborately dressed. Behind her stood the chauffeur, and in his arms he held a small, silky black dog.

The dog had such a funny, wrinkled looking face that Angelina had to look at it to make sure it was the little creature peered at her from under a huge red satin bow.

"Well, here we are," announced Mrs. Pringle. "Parker," she commanded the chauffeur, "set Darling down, and then you may go." Then, turning to the waiting girls, she said: "I hope dinner is ready. Darling is used to having her meals on time and she doesn't like to be kept waiting. Let's eat as soon as I can get my things off. We can talk later while Darling is having her nap. She likes to go to sleep just as soon as she is through eating."

While Margaret was helping Mrs. Pringle remove her wraps Angelina hurried back to the kitchen and a few moments later they were all seated at the table. Darling had a chair close beside his mistress, because, as Mrs. Pringle explained, her food had to be cut up just so. The girls winced when they saw the little dog eating off the delicate china that had been put on the table for the expected guest. It was a long and tedious process coaxing Darling to eat, but after a while she was stuffed to her mistress's satisfaction and was carefully lifted down from the chair and laid to rest on a fat silk pillow on the davenport, where it was cool and quiet. When the little dog's snores satisfied Cousin Fanny that her pet was sleeping she herself settled cozily back in her chair and announced that she herself felt like taking forty winks after her dinner and journey. This left the Carters free to retire to the kitchen and do up the dinner work.

It was a good thing that Mrs. Pringle and Darling were tired and their naps were prolonged, for never before had it taken the Carter girls so long to do a mess of dishes. They did not talk much, for fear of disturbing the sleepers, but words under the circumstances were unnecessary. They would look at each other and go off into perfect spasms of laughter. They laughed until they cried.

"Can we hold out for a whole week, Angelina?" Margaret asked in a whisper.

"I don't know," Angelina answered. "But whether we do or not, I can see where the experience is going to do us a world of good, can't you?"

"Which do you prefer, Angelina—a trip abroad with Cousin Fanny as a companion or staying at home to keep Darling comfortable?" Margaret asked.

"Neither," Angelina answered, with finality in her voice. "I only want you, my home and my job when vacation ends. What about you, sister?"

"You have expressed my sentiments exactly. What fools we were getting to be to want to break up our dear home. And, Angelina, do you remember those lines, 'The more I see of men the better I like dogs'?"

Angelina nodded and they began to laugh again, and anyone who heard them would realize that nothing—nothing could ever spoil their companionship again.

A Matter of Duty

By R. RAY BAKER

Alice Troyer's heart was heavy as she turned from the window where, shrouded by a curtain, she had watched Henry Gordon disappear round a corner of the street.

She dropped into a chair and picked up a magazine she turned to the back and obediently began reading an advertisement in column.

"Discovered: The Mystery of Youthful Death," the headline of the advertisement in bright letters. And a headline below it was:

"Why Have You Died? The Story of a Young Man Who Died at the Age of Twenty." The headline was in bright letters, and it was a headline that Alice had seen before.

"The headline," she thought, "is the same as the one I saw in the paper last week. It is a headline that I have seen before."

Game of Polo Brought Eastward From Persia

Polo, the oldest of games played with stick and ball, was known to the ancient Persians 2,500 years ago. From the dusty plains of Persia the game spread eastward through the Vale of Cashmere on to the tableland of Tibet, where it was christened polo from the Tibetan word, ball.

For 250 years after this, its records in India were lost, but it again became popular there about the middle of the Nineteenth century.

Polo was first played in England in 1829 and a few years later it was adopted by other European countries, when many of its ancient rules were altered and improved.

Thus established in an English-speaking country, the game quickly crossed the Atlantic, where under clearer skies it swiftly traversed the American continent in a westward chase that did not end with the shores of the land of the sunset, but, skimming the Pacific, established itself in Samoa and other far off western islands.
